November 30

Thursday at 7:30 p.m.

For decades, the medical establishment has focused on producing pharmaceutical weapons to fight cancer—but some scientists are disillusioned with that approach. This program looks at developments in late-20th century cancer research, showing how environmental and dietary studies have become marginalized. Biostatistician, John Bailar, laments conventional wisdom, calling for more preventive emphasis, while Andrew Von Eschenbach, former National Cancer Institute director, ignores Nixon's 1971 declaration and blithely predicts a cure by 2015. The challenges involved in banning asbestos, expanding breast cancer awareness, and other concerns are also explored.

Discussion of film to follow.

This film was released on 7/06. Film running time: 53 minutes followed by a discussion.
